

Identity Theft

Not content with stealing your money for short-term financial gain, cybercriminals are invested in the long-term gain of identity theft.

1. Medical Theft

Rising medical costs have led to an increase in medical identity theft, with cybercriminals stealing medical insurance to use the benefits for themselves. Where this happens, any medical procedures carried out in your name will then be saved in your medical records.

2. Banking

Stealing private data can help cybercriminals access bank accounts, credit cards, social profiles and other online accounts. Armed with this information, an identity theft could file a fake tax return and collect the refund. They could even take out loans and ruin your credit rating (and your life as well).